Biographical / Historical

The study of visual arts at Yale began in 1832 with the opening of the Trumbull Gallery, the first art museum in the country to be connected with a college. A successful exhibition there in 1858 generated interest in formalized studies in art at Yale. The School of Fine Arts (1869-1955), made possible by a gift from Augustus Street (B.A. 1812), began soon thereafter and was established with the completion of Street Hall. A professorship in Painting and Design was created and the School was formally opened in 1869. The first Bachelor of Fine Arts was conferred in 1891. Courses in architecture began in 1908, and drama, a part of the School until 1955, was added in 1925. In 1928 the Yale Art Gallery was opened. A large addition to the Gallery, designed by Louis Kahn, opened in 1953. From 1955-1958, the School was briefly renamed the School of Architecture and Design. The designation of School of Art and Architecture was adopted in 1958 and used until 1971. In 1969, the internal organization of the faculty was led to the creation of the Faculty in Art and the Faculties in Design and Planning. In 1972 this action was formalized by the creation of two autonomous schools: the School of Art (1972-) and the School of Architecture (1972-). The two schools remain closely associated but are administratively separate
